

Name: William H. Campbell

Age: 43

Occupation: Partner in a Glasgow shipping and textile export firm

Social Status

Upper-middle-class Victorian gentleman with considerable wealth and education. Travels his wife, stays in fashionable hotels, and moves comfortably within elite European social circles.

Motivations for Travel

- To gain cultural refinement through exposure to art, architecture, and educated European society
- To improve his health and escape the industrial climate of Glasgow

France, 1867

This morning my wife and I breakfasted in our hotel overlooking the sea, surrounded by English and French visitors enjoying the comforts afforded to travellers of means. Having arrived comfortably by rail and steamer, I could not help but reflect upon how modern transport now allows businessmen such as myself to move across Europe with remarkable ease. After breakfast I visited a reading room frequented by merchants and investors, where discussion centred upon trade, railways, and Mediterranean commerce.

Later, I walked with my wife along the promenade among elegantly dressed travellers taking the sea air. I was free to enter cafés and business discussions as I pleased, while she remained bound by the expectations placed upon respectable women in society. France itself appears divided between luxury and labour — grand hotels rising above crowded markets and fishermen working along the harbour below.

Occupation: Wife of Wealthy
Businessman William H.
Campbell

Social Status

Wealthy upper-middle-class Victorian wife travelling as the companion of her husband. Her status affords her luxury accommodation, fashionable clothing, and access to elite European social spaces, though her independence remains socially restricted.

Motivations for Travel

- To accompany her husband during his continental business and leisure tour.
- To observe fashionable continental society and participate in elite social life abroad.

France, 1867

I awoke this morning in our elegant hotel in France, where servants hurried through the corridors attending to the endless luggage and arrangements required by continental travel. Though the railway and steamship have made journeys far more comfortable for wealthy families, I find travel still demands constant attention to appearance, etiquette, and social expectation. My husband moved easily between business rooms and cafés throughout the morning while I occupied myself with letters, unpacking, and preparing for our afternoon engagements.

Later we walked together along the promenade overlooking the sea, surrounded by fashionable European visitors dressed in their finest clothing. France is beautiful, though I often notice how differently men and women experience such travel. While my husband enjoys freedom to explore and conduct business independently, I am expected always to remain composed, respectable, and suitably accompanied within public society.

Name: Thomas Reid

Age: 27

Occupation: Dock labourer and seasonal ship worker from the west coast of Scotland.

Social Status

Working-class labourer with limited financial security. Unlike wealthy travellers, he moves through Europe out of necessity and work obligations rather than comfort or personal enrichment. He travels in crowded shared quarters, carries his possessions himself.

Motivations for Travel

- To secure steady wages through work connected to expanding steamship and railway industries.
- To support family members financially at home.

France, 1867

The steamer reached France before sunrise, and by morning I was already unloading trunks and cargo beside the harbour with the other dock men. The wealthy passengers climbed toward the grand hotels while we remained below in the heat and noise of the port. I carried luggage for an English family this afternoon, their cases finer than anything I shall ever own, though the pay was enough to secure another night's lodging and a warm meal.

Later, while walking briefly along the promenade, I watched fashionable visitors taking the sea air while fishermen repaired their nets below the harbour walls. France is beautiful, certainly, though for men such as myself it is not a place of leisure but of work. Still, I cannot deny that travelling beyond Scotland has shown me more of the world than I once imagined possible.

Name: Emma Sinclair

Age: 25

Occupation: Digital marketing and social media consultant

Social Status

Educated middle-class solo traveller with financial independence and access to affordable international travel. Unlike nineteenth-century travellers, she benefits from modern mobility, digital technology, and significantly greater social freedom as a young woman travelling alone.

Motivations for Travel

- To explore historically and culturally significant European destinations such as Nice
- To pursue personal independence and self-development through solo travel

France, 2026

I spent the morning wandering through the narrow streets of Nice with a coffee in hand, stopping often to photograph the colourful buildings and quiet cafés before the crowds arrived. After checking emails from my apartment rental, I worked remotely for a few hours near the promenade, something that would have seemed impossible to travellers even a generation ago. The freedom to move independently, work online, and travel alone still feels remarkable to me.

In the evening I explored the seafront and watched tourists gather along the beach as the city became busier with nightlife and music. Nice feels carefully designed for visitors now, yet there are still moments — in the quieter streets and local markets — where the city seems more authentic and personal than the images seen online.

Social Status

Middle-class independent traveller with financial flexibility and access to affordable global tourism. Unlike nineteenth-century male travellers whose freedom depended heavily on wealth and class privilege, Daniel benefits from modern transport, digital technology, and accessible tourism infrastructure.

Motivations for Travel

- To experience different cultures and lifestyles outside the UK.
- To document his travels through photography and social media

Name: Daniel Fraser

Age: 26

Occupation: Freelance graphic designer

France, 2026

This morning I took my camera through the old streets of Nice before the day became too warm, stopping at small bakeries and cafés along the way. The city feels relaxed compared with home, and travelling here is almost effortless with modern rail links, online bookings, and everything accessible through a phone. By midday I settled at a café terrace overlooking the sea to complete some freelance design work before continuing to explore.

Later I walked the promenade as tourists, locals, and street performers filled the waterfront. It struck me how different modern travel must be from the journeys of nineteenth-century visitors who came here only through wealth and privilege. Now people from many backgrounds move easily through the same streets once reserved for Europe's elite travellers.

Starting the Journey: Enhanced Image

Starting the Journey: Everyone's Perspective

William Campbell – Wealthy Victorian Businessman

The harbour was crowded with passengers, servants, and trunks this morning, though our first-class arrangements spared us much of the confusion faced by ordinary travellers. Even amidst the disorder, I could not help but admire how steam travel now connects Europe with such speed and regularity for gentlemen of means.

Margaret Campbell – Wealthy Victorian Traveller

The boarding process was exhausting despite our comforts, with luggage requiring constant supervision and crowds pressing tightly along the docks. As a woman, I was expected to remain calm and composed throughout the confusion while relying heavily upon my husband and attendants to manage our movements.

Starting the Journey: Everyone's Perspective

Thomas Reid – Working-Class Labourer

Most of the morning was spent carrying heavy trunks aboard for passengers who scarcely noticed the men hauling their possessions through the crowd. For labourers like myself, the steamship brings work and wages, though little of the comfort enjoyed by those travelling above deck.

Emma Sinclair – Modern Female Traveller

It's strange to imagine travel once involving crowds, trunks, and hours of physical boarding just to begin a journey. Now I can book flights on my phone, carry a single suitcase, and cross Europe in a few hours with far more independence and freedom as a woman travelling alone.

Daniel Fraser – Modern Male Traveller

The entire scene feels chaotic compared with modern travel, where tickets, passports, and directions are all managed digitally within minutes. What once seemed innovative and exclusive now feels slow and physically demanding beside the accessibility of modern tourism and transport.

Getting Around and Sightseeing : Enhanced Image

Getting Around and Sightseeing: Everyone's Perspective

William Campbell – Wealthy Victorian Businessman

Our carriage required an astonishing quantity of trunks and travelling cases, though such burdens are expected when touring the Continent in comfort and proper style. While sightseeing remains one of the pleasures of travel, it is clear that only those with sufficient wealth and leisure can move so freely between cities and countries.

Margaret Campbell – Wealthy Victorian Traveller

Much of the morning was spent ensuring our luggage, clothing, and personal belongings were properly arranged before we could continue our journey. Though I greatly enjoy seeing new places, a woman travelling in society must always remain respectable, well presented, and accompanied, even during the simplest daily excursions.

Getting Around and Sightseeing: Everyone's Perspective

Thomas Reid – Working-Class Labourer

I watched wealthy travellers arrive with more luggage than a labouring family might own altogether, each trunk needing lifted and secured before departure. For working people, transport is rarely about sightseeing or pleasure — it is simply a way to follow work wherever it may be found.

Emma Sinclair – Modern Female Traveller

Travelling today feels far lighter and more independent compared with these formal Victorian journeys filled with servants, heavy luggage, and strict expectations. I can move around cities alone, carry everything myself, and choose where to go without needing supervision or elaborate planning.

Daniel Fraser – Modern Male Traveller

Modern tourism is built around speed and convenience, while nineteenth-century travel appears slow, physical, and heavily dependent upon class and social status. What stands out most is how sightseeing once required significant money, time, and preparation, whereas now travel is accessible to far wider groups of people.

Dining Abroad : Enhanced Image

Dining Abroad : Everyone's Perspective

William Campbell – Wealthy Victorian Businessman

Dinner this evening was conducted with all the ceremony expected among respectable travellers, the conversation turning from trade and railways to politics and society across Europe. Such occasions are as important to a gentleman's reputation as the journey itself, requiring careful planning, proper introductions, and constant attention to etiquette.

Margaret Campbell – Wealthy Victorian Traveller

Formal dinners abroad demand considerable preparation, from suitable dress to proper manners and conversation throughout the evening. A lady is expected to remain composed and socially graceful at all times, for even while travelling one's conduct reflects directly upon family status and respectability.

Dining Abroad: Everyone's Perspective

Thomas Reid – Working-Class Labourer

I caught sight of wealthy guests dining in the hotel while carrying coal and supplies through the rear entrance earlier this evening. Their world seems entirely separate from ours — evenings spent in comfort and conversation while working men finish the day exhausted from labour.

Emma Sinclair – Modern Female Traveller

Travel now feels far more relaxed than these highly formal Victorian experiences, where every meal and social interaction appeared carefully controlled. Today I can book restaurants instantly on my phone, eat casually, and travel without the pressure of maintaining strict social expectations.

Daniel Fraser – Modern Male Traveller

Modern travel involves far less planning and social formality than nineteenth-century tourism, where schedules, luggage, dress, and etiquette shaped every part of the experience.

Technology now removes much of that stress — accommodation, transport, and communication can all be organised within minutes, leaving more freedom to simply enjoy the place itself.

Andrew Macgeorge

Author of Journal of a Continental Tour, 1867–1868

In reflecting upon these journeys, I am struck by how greatly travel is shaped not only by place, but by class, labour, gender, and circumstance. The wealthy traveller experiences Europe through comfort, leisure, and opportunity, while the labouring man sees the same ports and streets through work and hardship.

Likewise, the freedoms granted to gentlemen are not so readily afforded to women, whose travels remain governed by expectation and social restraint. Yet each perspective reveals something valuable about the world through which we move.

Final Notes from the Original Author

Looking now from the modern age, it is evident that travel has changed beyond anything imaginable in 1867. What once demanded steamships, trunks, servants, and months of careful planning may now be accomplished with ease, speed, and independence through modern transport and technology. Places once reserved largely for the privileged classes are now accessible to millions, and the experience of travel itself has become far more personal, flexible, and connected.

And yet, despite these changes, the purpose of travel remains remarkably familiar: to observe, to compare, to learn, and to better understand both foreign places and ourselves. In this, the experiences recorded within Journal of a Continental Tour, 1867–1868 continue to echo across time, reminding us that every traveller sees the world through the conditions of their own age
